

Journées d'études / Workshop

L'Islam aux vents des îles

Island Islam

Aix-Marseille Université
Campus Saint-Charles

26 et 27 juin 2017

Journées d'études / Workshop

L'Islam aux vents des îles – Island Islam

Centre de Recherche et de Documentation sur l'Océanie, CREDO
Maison Asie Pacifique - Aix Marseille Université

26 et 27 juin 2017

Lundi 26/06		Modérateurs	Intervenants	Titre
Accueil des participants	9h00	CREDO – Bâtiment 15 – 2 ^e étage
Salle LSH 412 Bâtiment 15	9h30	Présentation du workshop Lorenzo Brutti
Salle visioconférence	10h00	Serge Tcherkézoff	Debra Mac Dougall	Islam, Christianity, ancestors, and others? Religious pluralism in the contemporary Pacific
	11h00	Lorenzo Brutti	Jaap Timer	West Papua: Christian Theocracies and Islamic Secularities
Salle LSH 412 Bâtiment 15	14h15	Serge Tcherkézoff Lorenzo Brutti	Rainer Bushmann	Islam in the Historical Borderlands of the Pacific and the Indian Oceans
Coffee break	15h15		Scott Flower	Islam in Papua New Guinea: Religious and Cultural Change
Salle LSH 412 Bâtiment 15	15h45		Melica Ouennoughi	La diffusion de l'Islam en Nouvelle-Calédonie
	16h45		Emmanuelle Crane	Networks and media coverage of Islam & Muslims in Samoa & French Polynesia
Mardi 27/06
Salle LSH 412 Bâtiment 15	10h00	Lorenzo Brutti	Thorgeir Kolshus	A singular character. The sorcery of Osama bin Laden
Coffee break	11h00
Salle LSH 412 Bâtiment 15	11h30		Marc Tabani	Man Abraham, Man Skul, Man Muslam : Tannese representations of the peoples of the Book
Clôture	12h30			Discussion générale

Participants : titres et résumés des présentations

Scott Flower (Global Centre of Research and Engagement)

Islam in Papua New Guinea: Religious and Cultural Change

This paper provides a historical and ethnographic analysis of the establishment and growth of Islam in Papua New Guinea (PNG). The data used includes archival records from the Islamic society of Papua New Guinea and over 100 interviews with PNG Muslim converts. The paper explores the causes and patterns of religious conversion to Islam by indigenous PNG citizens and what religious change might mean for the country and the wider Pacific region.

Debra McDougall (University of Western Australia)

Islam, Christianity, ancestors, and others? Religious pluralism in the contemporary Pacific

Though small in number, Pacific Islander Muslims and other non-Christians pose a challenge to local ideas of indigenised Christianity as the basis for national and community identity. They also challenge well-established anthropological approaches to the anthropology of Christianity in the region and beyond. Like so many others in the world, contemporary Pacific Island Muslims seem to be religious ancestors to questions about where they belong in a rapidly changing world, sometimes looking back to a culturally distinctive ancestral past and sometimes to a cosmopolitan world where cultural difference is no barrier to unity.

Jaap Timer (Macquarie University)

West Papua: Christian Theocracies and Islamic Secularities

West Papua is above all differently situated re Islam than all other Pacific regions because it is a Christian margin in a Muslim-majority nation. Interestingly, the kind of institutionalistic/legalistic use of religion is more prominent among Christian Papuans than among Muslim Papuans. For the non-Papuan migrants in Papua, Islam and Christianity are often rather different matters but not unconnected to the religious dynamics among Papuans.

In other words, West Papua could feature as a case for challenging common assumptions about Islam and Christianity and their relationship to the state. What I can offer is a written overview of Islam in West Papua and an elaboration (in relation to the anthropology of religion) of the points above.

Rainer Buschmann (Channel Islands University)

"Islam in the Historical Borderlands of the Pacific and the Indian Oceans"

Although many world historians like to draw distinctive boundaries separating the Indian from the Pacific oceans, human ingenuity has transcended such postulated divides for centuries. The paper will highlight the trade networks emerging out of Island Southeast Asia since the fourteenth century and investigate their peripheral reaches into New Guinea and Australia. While the study initiates with a delineation of trade circuits and the coveted resources found in Oceania, I will place particular emphasis on cultural heritage, most specifically traces of Islam, that have impacted the region.

Thorgeir Kolshus (University of Oslo)

A singular character. The sorcery of Osama bin Laden

In the aftermath of 9/11, FBI's 'Wanted'-posters featuring Osama bin Laden in various guises were spread across the globe, even reaching the wall of the Post Office of Sola, the capitol of Vanuatu's northern most Torba province. To people on the island of Mota, these images of the man behind the attack on what since WWII had been the impervious Americans soon turned into a narrative of his shape-shifting capacities. This was in its turn linked both to the abilities of the sorcerers of nearby Maewo and to John Woo's 1997 film Face/Off, featuring John Travolta changing faces with the comatose villain Nicholas Cage in order to avert a terrorist attack, which somebody had watched during a visit to the nearest town. His skills were also compared to those of the ordained Anglican clergy and the members of the Melanesian Brotherhood, an indigenous monastic order. A handful had heard that bin Laden's 'Church', loglue, was Islam, but apart from the fact that it was present in Fiji, people had few ideas of what it entailed.

In this paper, I discuss how the fascination for Osama bin Laden's capacities and the extraordinary appeal of the story of his ultimate demise speak of the role played by the imaginary in bridging the gaps between different levels of experience, and how the definite, the probable, and the unlikely are negotiated with reference to these levels of experience. I will also discuss the process of coming to terms with a new ideological complex, such as Islam, by means of comparing it to systems with which people are familiar, and juxtapose this to the way the first Anglican missionaries appropriated key terms from the pre-Christian Mota cosmology, such as mana, vui ("spirit") and tapu, in order to convey the essence of the new creed.

Marc Tabani (CNRS-CREDO)

Man Abraham, Man Skul, Man Muslim : Tannese representations of the peoples of the Book

My presentation will deal with the recent emergence of Islam in a specific island society. Tanna's religious specificities have been historically molded by the long reign of a "Christian theocracy", followed by a long-lasting political reaction to colonial Christian exclusiveness, in the form of a powerful syncretistic movement largely oriented toward the indigenization of the Old Testament. Reinterpreting millenarian aspects of the New Testament has been encompassed by the faith to a prophetic spiritual figure known as "John Frum". I will examine how in the context of year 2000 fears, 9/11 terror attacks, and Iraq war, people of Tanna has been particularly impressed by their discovery of the "Man Muslim" and his struggle to defend its "kastom". It is not surprising that the first groups that have converted to Islam in Tanna are former and still crypto John Frum followers. How and why the rich syncretistic experience of the Tannese has immediately been applied to Islam will be also part of my observations and comments.

Mélica Ouennoughi (Docteur en anthropologue, chercheuse indépendante)

La diffusion de l'Islam en Nouvelle-Calédonie

En premier lieu, nous apporterons les retombées scientifiques sur la présence historique des Nord-Africains en Nouvelle-Calédonie au XIX^e siècle. Le recensement de l'Ined en 1996 ne fait pas état de leur origine ni même de leur religion. Ils seraient donc majoritairement chrétiens ou n'auraient pas de religion. Néanmoins, mes premières enquêtes de terrain en 1998 avaient observé une religiosité nord-africaine introduite à partir de l'édification d'un saint-patron en 1891 donnant naissance à une mixité calédonienne. Cette communication discutera en premier lieu de l'histoire cachée du soufisme de l'Islam, qui était déjà bien présent à la fin du XIX^e siècle. Comment le saint-patron musulman a pu contourner l'ancrage du christianisme colonial dominant, pourtant solidement ancré en effet dans le Pacifique? La vieille coutume des nomades de l'ancien caravansérail a fait naître une religiosité particulière à travers des rites particuliers recomposés à partir de biens immatériels issus de la brousse kanak. Les années 68 ont vu naître une association au lieu-dit du vieux cimetière, dont la descendance organise les coutumes et de petits pèlerinages (mekkam) dédiés aux anciens du bagne (chioukh). Nos enquêtes complémentaires avec la collaboration de la recherche agronomique saharienne émettent l'hypothèse que de vieux noyaux de dattes ont été dispersés en terre aborigène d'Australie durant la fin du XIX^e siècle, une geste ancestrale introduite à l'origine du vieux dicton kanak?

En second lieu, nous poursuivrons vers des formes d'organisation associative d'une « Islam globale » plus revendicatrice que coutumière depuis les années 1980 formée par des fonds privés étrangers, accueillant de nouveaux adeptes indonésiens, fidjiens, yéménites mais également autochtones mélanésiens.

Emmanuelle Crane (PhD EHESS)

Networks and media coverage of Islam & Muslims in Samoa & French Polynesia

In the mid-1980s, Islamic da'wah organizations were active in the Pacific. According to M. Terdiman, the first native Samoan converted in the mid-1985s (due to the efforts of the WAMY – World Assembly of Muslim Youth – director based in New Zealand) while the Fiji Muslim League helped the small Samoan Muslim community to give Islamic education to its children. Yet, according to the FML, Muslim communities in Tonga and Western Samoa are declining "due to migration and lack of support which caused some of these converts to slowly neglect Islam and to convert back to their old religions or are no longer members of any religion". In neighbouring French Polynesia, anti-mosque demonstrations occurred in 2014 in protest at plans to build Tahiti's first mosque. This paper wishes to address the media coverage of Islam in Samoa and French Polynesia and to explore established religious networks in both countries.